London's all-night Tube
as a century of midnight movies

The Underground imagined as Friday and Saturday nights at the Scala cinema club

- Central line
- Victoria line
- In the spring...

2016's Scalarama film festival is different in London from previous years. If you go to a late night film screening, you can now get home on the Night Tube as well as on a night bus. From mid-August, somewhat reduced Victoria and Central line services run 24 hours. The Piccadilly and a cut-down Northern line service will be added in the autumn; these are marked in grey on this map, which is more true to the real topography of London and to the Underground system than Harry Beck's beautiful 1930s Modernist design, still the basis of the Transport for London map today.

For more than seventy years, Beck's map has shaped how people mentally picture London's complexity. Taking his inspiration from an electrical circuit, Beck dispensed with actual distances to present a legible, idealised, simple and efficient diagram of the capital as fluid motion, as a mobile and motile city. Beck imagined London as a Mandala rather than as a machine for living in.

From the end of the Victorian era, electrical technologies allowed Londoners to re-imagine their streets. Electric lighting extended the hours of work, shopping and leisure. Electrified public transport made it affordable and practical to travel across the entire city. Electricity freed the night up for pleasure, for exploration, to seek out like-minds and new possibilities. The Cinematograph - arguably the last machine of the Machine Age - had the biggest impact of all Victorian and Edwardian technologies in this sense because it drew people to warm, welcoming public spaces, out of the London rain, where you could experience many people's stories, magically materialised from electric light (cinema has its roots in stage magic and the music hall). In 1915, D W Griffith had turned this into big business by conjuring up collective fears of the other in 'Birth of Nation', and Hollywood was born. There's a twin, left-handed, more European idea of cinema, though. Fuzzy, more like dreams than fantasies of power. Its spirit was infused in 'art house', 'cult' cinema, midnight movies in the 1970s, and in the legacy of the Scala cinema club that was at Kings Cross till the early 1990s.

The Scalarama festival has inherited its name, its febrile energy and its eclectic approach to film programming. In this Scala film map we've connected movies to Tube stops where they were filmed or which they have a connection to, usually through the cast or crew, sometimes tenuously at that. So at Lambeth North is Louis Feuillade's 'Les Vampires', still in production in France a century ago despite the outbreak of WWI, about a group of anarchists who burst into the bedrooms of the 1% and terrorise them in skin-tight bat suits. 'Les Vampires' went on to influence dada and surrealism, and is a presence in films like George Franju's 'Judex'. It was in the programme of one of the early film festivals in London after the sequel to WWI, playing at the NFT at South Bank in 1963.

The advent of the Night Tube takes Londoners back to the Edwardian future, before the Jubilee line and the DLR were built. Travellers in the early hours will join an existing nocturnal population of urban foxes and shift workers in hi-vis vests, becoming a transient congregation of flâneurs rediscovering the empty streets. Much as people going home on a night bus after hanging out at the Scala may have remembered a mind-expanding film double bill - but in fact they fell asleep, so dreamed half of it - these modern somnambulists will find that Beck's map isn't the territory; it's an idea, an ideal. Lambeth North isn't part of the Night Tube, yet. You would need to walk for 8 minutes, to Waterloo. After late shows at the Genesis cinema in Whitechapel, go North to Bethnal Green not West to Whitechapel Station (which would be shut after midnight). As well as making the links to the stories about London contained in these films, we've included some visual landmarks and walking times too, mnemonic milestones to help you find your way in the dark.

The Scala Review Show, bringing you highlights of the Scalarama festival and more, is live in September Mondays and Fridays, 9pm on Resonance 104.4 FM in London and ResonanceFM.com
